Benedictine university basic reporting students, Watergate

Benedictine University basic reporting students were involved in the Watergate scandal in a number of ways.

First, a number of Benedictine University students were working as interns at the Washington Post when the scandal broke. These students helped to break the story of the Watergate break-in and the subsequent cover-up.

Second, Benedictine University journalism professor David Wise was one of the first reporters to investigate the Watergate scandal. Wise's reporting helped to bring the scandal to light and led to the resignation of President Richard Nixon.

Third, Benedictine University students and alumni were involved in the protests against the Vietnam War, which were a major factor in the Watergate scandal. The protests against the war led to a loss of public trust in the government, which contributed to the Watergate scandal.

Overall, Benedictine University basic reporting students played a significant role in the Watergate scandal. Their reporting and activism helped to bring the scandal to light and led to the resignation of President Richard Nixon.
